More specifically, this invention relates to security devices which allow access to tool only after a predetermined amount of force is applied to the security device. This invention also relates to security devices which are integral with the tool. The prior art is aware of a number of security devices which restrict access to tools. Among the more well-known of these are the various arrangements of padlocks which are used to restrict the use of tools such as knives. Such devices are well known for permitting access to tools only after a certain amount of force is applied to the device. By way of example, one common type of padlock has a shackle which is moved by a key into engagement with a second shackle. The two shackle are arranged in such a way that the shackle on the key can be moved past the shackle on the tool only when a predetermined amount of force is applied to the device. While the prior art is also aware of tools which are locked to a support, the prior art has not provided any locking mechanisms which are integral with the tool. Thus, the prior art has not taught a device which is integral with a tool and which requires that a predetermined amount of force be applied to the device in order to release the tool.
