(No problem again) Structural basis for active targeting of a thymidine phosphorylase-targeting siRNA into ovarian cancer stem cells. The two common types of advanced cancer are epithelial and ovarian cancer. Epithelial cancer consists of heterogeneous cells, including cancer stem cells, and is characterized by easy metastasis and recurrence. Ovarian cancer stem cells (OSCs) are regarded as the root cause of ovarian cancer because they proliferate in clumps and rarely express a key anti-cancer gene, thymidine phosphorylase (TP). A recent study demonstrated that TP-based siRNA selectively inhibits cell growth of OSCs. However, how TP-based siRNAs are internalized into OSCs is unclear. In the present study, we developed two types of nano-sized particles based on hydrodynamic size (naked and solid lipid nanoparticles) and explored the method to efficiently deliver siRNA into OSCs. The naked particles achieved efficient cellular uptake without any transfection reagents. The solid lipid nanoparticles demonstrated more efficient cellular uptake than the naked particles in OSCs. In addition, these particles showed similar cellular uptake patterns and significantly decreased intracellular levels 3e33713323
