non-destructive, non-residue, simple, fast and low cost method for skin identification based on Fourier transform infrared spectroscopy (FT-IR) has been developed. FT-IR spectra were obtained from a low-resolution attenuated total reflectance (ATR) IR device equipped with diamond crystal and a standard ATR accessory. The methods were validated using human remains collected from known donors and by comparative analysis to reference samples including human skin, cadavers, plastics, leather, textiles, etc. and biological samples containing human DNA, which were considered as reference material. FT-IR spectroscopic analysis can distinguish human skin from other samples with 100% accuracy. FT-IR spectra of human skin (n = 29) were characterized by four bands at 1110, 1459, 1563, and 1655 cm(-1) with average band centers of 1169, 1464, 1566, and 1652 cm(-1), respectively. FT-IR spectra of cadaver skin (n = 29) were characterized by three bands at 1218, 1527, and 1636 cm(-1) with average band centers of 1226, 1527, and 1632 cm(-1), respectively. FT-IR spectra of human skin from four different donors were evaluated by principal component analysis (PCA) and visual discriminant analysis (DA). PCA showed a clear discrimination between human skin and cadaver skin. The sensitivity of the new method was 100% (29/29) and the specificity of the new method was 95.4% (24/25) with respect to the known donors. The new method provides a suitable, non-destructive, simple, fast, and low cost approach for forensic skin identification.Q: Testing a health check, how do I ensure that the correct target is tested?
